Version 1.0, October 11th, 2026

Background:

Isthmus Free Zone Corpo Homebrew Setting

It's 2095, a few years after the Tendril Access Plague decimated human life across the galaxy. The TAP 1.0 units have almost universally been recalled, and people now use TAP 2.0 units. Life in the Isthmus Free Zone is relatively easier for people associated with corporations. The civil wars waged simultaneously throughout the region during the 2060s were cut short when a group of international corporations came together to quickly massacre the guerrillas and their associates, ending the war in under a week in 2067 and unifying the zones into a singular Isthmus Free Zone, now a tax heaven that, for some, is a real Rand-inspired heaven reminiscent of pre-handover Hong Kong. While life is definitely most comfortable for the odd 40% to 60% of the population linked to these megacorporations, the informal markets, the unwashed masses, don't necessarily have it bad. They can reap the benefits of living in the corps' back yards and dealing with their employees, always dreaming of being hired by one, always machinating, trying to get as many benefits from this arrangement as possible.

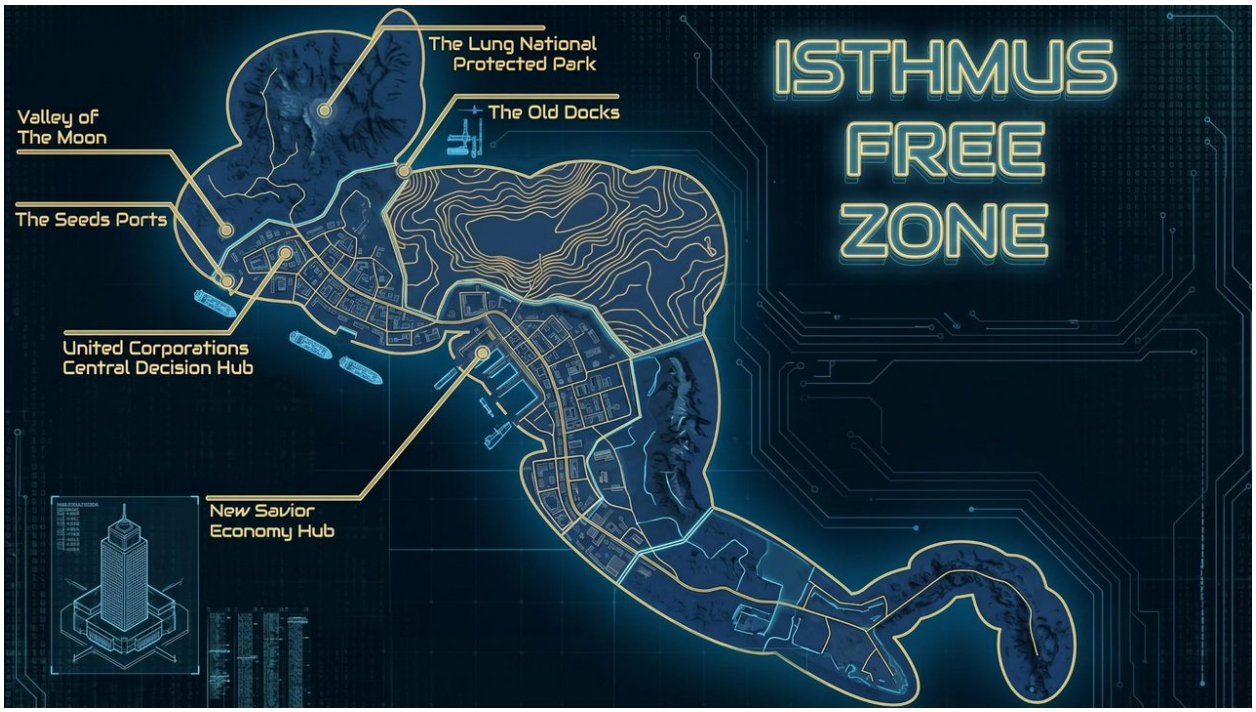

In the Valley of the Moon, a small city towards the north of the Isthmus Free Zone, Telcom United Services, one of these megacorps stemming from Canada, has a branch office where the premade characters are employed at, working in diverse positions throughout the last few years. The office building of this corporation is located in the middle of a 1km-radius sprawl comprising residential and business blocks, generally related to the company itself: the houses and apartments occupied by Telcom's exclusively Human 2.0 employees, as well as the businesses they tend to frequent. A couple km towards the southeast, a different megacorp, Daily Neural, has its own offices and sprawl, with a block of about half a kilometer radius of unrelated city in between each sprawl, much dirtier, much less secure. Politics appear stable surface-level, with each megacorp controlling their stable territories and the midway zones generally benefiting from their proximity, but jealousy, disatisfaction and the aspirations of a majority of Human 1.0 population are bringing back dreams of socialism and revolution that, while easy for the megacorps to extinguish, may nonetheless explode a powderkeg of political violence.

A cyberpsychosis homebrew ruleset, as a Hindrance depending on installing augmentations over Strain, is provided to mimic the effects of cyberpsychosis in the Cyberpunk setting.

Session 1:

Saving Karol Oshima

GM Note: Premade Character Usage

The Seasoned premade characters provided for Session 1 represent high-tier, fully augmented corporate assets, designed to feel powerful, well-equipped, and lethal. The GM should present them to the players as an elite prologue squad on a high-stakes test run. If the party executes the mission cleanly and maintains operational stealth, these characters carry over into Session 2 as an earned mechanical reward. If the infiltration fails and their identities are blown, they become disposable casualties of the corporate meat grinder, serving as valuable recurring NPCs, hostile deniable operatives, or wanted fugitives for the remainder of the campaign while the players roll new entry-level Human 2.0 recruits for the department

Chapter 1.1: Department of Dynamic Operational Logistics

At 3:24 PM on a Thursday, the operatives receive an encrypted priority summon via TAP to Floor 13 of the central Telcom tower. In a sterile corner suite, VP David Vargas informs them that he has hand-picked their roster for a newly created unit: the Department of Dynamic Operational Logistics. The pitch carries obvious executive allure: substantial salary increases, discretionary expense allowances, and broad tactical freedom to deploy their specialized skills without red tape.

A trial run stands between them and the promotion. Telcom has temporarily scrubbed their service records and employee credentials from corporate directories to ensure total deniability. Their objective: execute a discreet poaching operation to extract a lead researcher from Daily Neural, a rival megacorporation maintaining a sprawling regional hub only a few kilometers away.

Karol Oshima is a prominent biohacker widely celebrated for breakthroughs in genetic conservation and synthetic zoology. If questioned about Telcom's sudden interest in ecological sciences, Vargas lies smoothly, claiming the company is decommissioning an agricultural plantation to build a private safari park. The operational urgency, however, is real. Oshima agreed to defect with his life's research in exchange for asylum, scheduling an extraction rendezvous with a Telcom driver outside Daily's perimeter for 5:00 PM. Two hours ago, his encrypted comm line went completely silent.

The operatives must take an unmarked commercial utility van into Daily Neural territory, bypass facility security, and retrieve the scientist. Under no circumstances may Telcom be tied to the operation. Vargas provides an untraceable 100,000-credit bearer chip to sweeten the deal should Oshima develop second thoughts. While extracting Oshima alive remains an explicit priority, retrieving the physical and digital cores of his research is non-negotiable.

David Vargas

Chapter 1.2: Infiltration

The party must find a way to infiltrate the Daily offices. They're free to decide how. They could use contacts to try and land a job interview, they could attempt to find a bar frequented by Daily employees and steal blueprints from their TAP to then go in using stealth, or go in guns blazing. It is their decision, but the actions they take must have consequences. It's preferable if, throughout this process, the party learns how Daily's stocks have gone down for a variety of reasons lately, which has led to hiring less people and overworking their employees, causing discontent. This is the reason why Karol has decided to jump ship.

Inside the offices of Daily, they must find Karol Oshima. The offices for the genetics departments are on the fifth floor of the building, but the testing grounds are in the 2nd basement, where Karol is leading a team composed of only himself, as ascertained by floor maps and interactions with Daily-related NPCs.

Chapter 1.3: Feral augmentation and a lost eye

Once the party reaches the 2nd basement, they must roll a Spirit trait check, as what they find is shocking. Failing it will make them lose one combat round.

An old underground parking lot turned testing ground smelling of wet dog and blood, there's 3 open cages with tables and terminals placed next to them. A main desk is in the middle of the office, terminal and papers thrown around all over. Sitting on an office chair and laying on top of the desk, the corpse of an old man is laying down, being devoured by a genetically modified German Shepherd. Two smaller modified German Shepherds are also marauding the office. Battle ensues.

Once the old man's station can be reviewed, at first glance, it looks like Oshima was killed by someone. His head was smashed against his desk. An augmented eye is missing from its socket, his terminal is open but password locked, and all his desk drawers are open, with papers thrown around.

If the party takes time to investigate, they'll find the missing eye next to one of the back legs of the desk. If they analyze the eye, they'll find a recording of the last 15 minutes before it was disconnected. Oshima is stumbling, copying data, selecting printed documents to stash into a briefcase and a backpack. Throughout this process, he's had to insert passwords numerous times, but it's always the same one: 0pass!Word0. At some point, after incorrectly inserting a password, his head hits the desk and the video turns red. After hitting the desk numerous times, the eye pops out.

The party should preferably be led to believe Oshima was murdered that way, but a biohacker or clinic doc passing a Notice, Common Knowledge, Science, Healing, Smarts or similar roll (to the GM's discretion) would know Oshima failed a trait check and activated the Cyberpsychosis homebrew ruleset for this module.

If they hack the terminal or use the password from the recording, they'll gain access to the terminal to finish copying the data. A notice trait check will let them know there will be an audit at 5pm on the dot.

Karol Oshima

Chapter 1.4: From the Underground

If the party doesn't notice the scheduled audit or doesn't manage to stealth out by 5pm, the elevator will open and an auditor accompanied by 4 security guards will access the basement. The auditor will attempt to escape, while the guards start a combat section against the party. If any of the 5 NPCs escapes with pictures of the party in their TAP archives, the party will have essentially failed the session, as discretion was a requirement. Consequences will be explained in the last chapter of the session.

Chapter 1.5: Only God Forgives

If the party manages to leave the offices of Daily stealthily or without leaving witnesses, they're free to go back to the Telcom offices. If they don't, they'll have to fight the rest of the security guards in the first basement and lobby. How many is up to the GM. If the party is beaten and/or captured, the session is over. If they manage to escape, they'll be persecuted throughout the Daily sprawl by patrols. If they take too long to escape the sprawl, they'll be met at some point in an alleyway by Vargas, who is tracking their corporate TAP and traveling incognito in an unmarked car.

Chapter 1.6: The Daily Neural Terrorist Attack of 2095

Whether the party successfully delivers the data or Vargas takes it from their TAP, Vargas will initially believe they murdered Oshima. If the party didn't fail the session and pass a persuasion roll, that's enough. If they failed the session and met with Vargas, it doesn't matter whether he believes them or not; the premade characters are fired and become NPCs to either (a) some of them are given facial reconstruction and a new identity to serve as hired guns directly under Vargas, not under Telcom, or (b) all of their Telcom accesses are revoked, including their corporate housing and any Telcom contact they had. The GM can use these NPCs later in the module in any way necessary.
Later in the day, the news will start reporting the terrorist attack that saw Oshima murdered. The gravity depends on the party's actions. If they weren't stealthy, they now have wanted posters all around the city and their faces are shown constantly in the news.
If the party did not fail the session, they can keep on using the premades. Otherwise, they'll have to create new Human 2.0 characters for Session 2 (as Telcom only hires Human 2.0s). Session 2 starts either next Monday if the party was successful, thus keeping the premade characters; or a month later, if the party was unsuccessful and the players had to make new characters. If this is the case, the Daily sprawl has started expanding, encroaching in the free sections and causing more local discontent, and if some of the characters escaped, they are now wanted for the murder of Karol Oshima and the terrorist attack.

Session 2:

Gatos sin Reservas

Chapter 2.1: Serial Experiments

Coming from the previous frantic session, this one is supposed to offer respite, either to the tired premade characters from Session 1, or to the players who lost their premades and had to make newly hired characters, newly graduated from Telcom's private university. It is a mission with lots of free roleplaying space and up to two lower stakes combat sections.

The party arrives at the company building on Monday morning at 8am, pointed to an office that was built either a week or a month ago, depending on whether it's the premades or a new batch of characters respectively. Two smaller offices were joined at the end of the third floor of the building, tagged as the offices for the Department of Dynamic Operational Logistics.

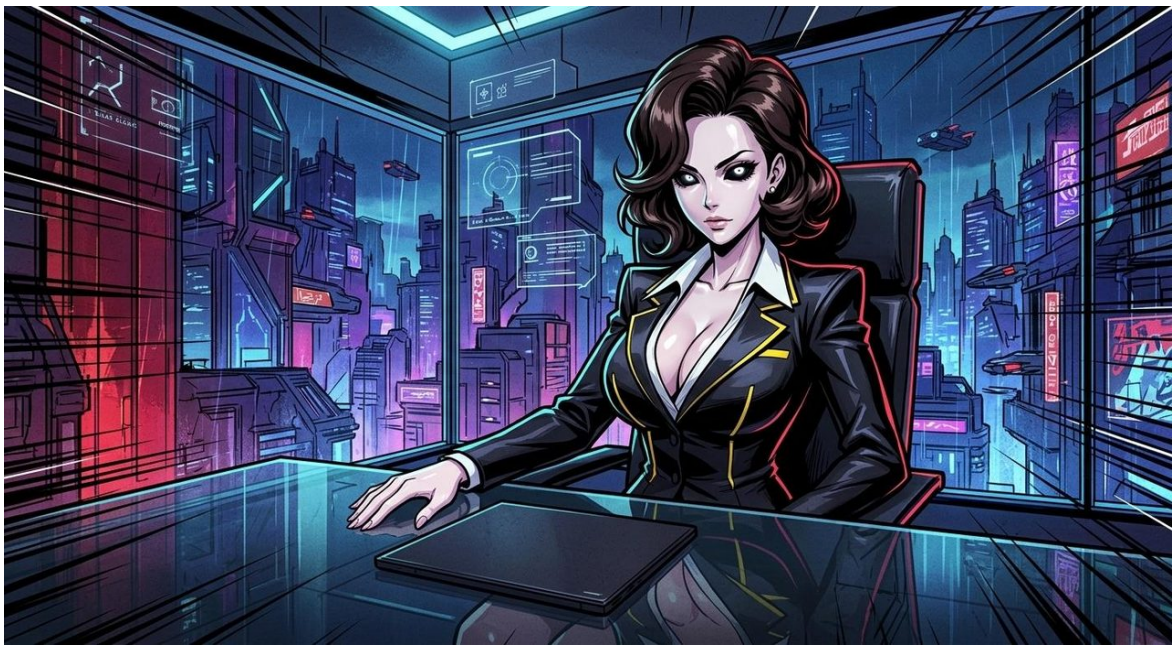

Here, they meet their manager, Vittoria Esposito, who responds directly to VP Vargas, who has rapidly moved up in the corporation's hierarchy and now has an office in Floor 47.

Vittoria is a beautiful, sensual woman seemingly in either her late '20s or early '30s. Players who actively roll Notice against her will know her skin is too perfect however. No blemish at all, too white or too pink to be real skin, almost like actual porcelain, it must be augmentation of her whole skin. Other than that, the only noticeable augmentation consists of white irises in black sclera. A very motherly yet stoic, yet certainly sensual personality, she'd punish transgressions by, for example, having the player's corporate TAP display full black for a period of time, in practice turning off their eyes like a mother taking a bad boy's iPad. The GM should treat her as an approachable, affable character that nonetheless has clear boundaries set as the party's manager.

Vittoria has a clerk carry in some pizzas and coke, and leaves them to mingle with each other while she leaves to do paperwork after setting up a messaging group for the party via the TAP network. Give the players an in-game hour to mingle and roleplay.

At 9am sharp, Vittoria arrives pushing a cart with a server rack. The clerk comes after her, pushing an extendable set of desks with a TAP terminal for each one of the characters. Vittoria lets them know of their first task: one of the apparel sections of the corporation still has historical data in TAP 1.0 format. They are to transform this data to TAP 2.0 format. This rack should be exported by 5pm. A second rack should be picked up by the party the next day, from the 4th floor.

Give the party a chance to work on the task, roleplay, get their skills, edges and hindrances explored. They could use hacking, research, science, notice, smarts or similar traits to make the work more efficient, they could refuse to work or simply be bad at it. If the party looks into the data itself, they'll only find purchase transactions from millions of customers, buying hundreds of thousands of pieces of clothing. Old credit card information exists in encrypted form, but if the party decrypts it, the data is so old, the card numbers have been past expiry for a couple of years.
If the party attempts to retrieve the second server rack from the 4th floor, have Vittoria tell them it's not there, and it should be couried by truck throughout the night.
If the task is completed by 5pm, have Vittoria congratulate them on a job well done, and give each one a 50 credit coupon for a local bar, City on Fire Water. If the party finished over an hour earlier, she can even let them log out early, Vittoria is supposed to be one of the very few carrots in this stick of a general module. If the party didn't end in time, Vittoria is dejected, but she is not particularly confrontational. She'd tell them to make sure they pick up the second rack tomorrow morning, and to pick up the pace. If you want to have the party have a nonlethal damage combat section, at least some of the characters should move from the office to the bar. If they failed the task, they can get a flyer offering the first drink for free once they leave the offices, or utilize one of the characters' backgrounds to have them visit the bar. Maybe one of them frequented it back in college. If the party doesn't visit the bar, skip Chapter 2. The party won't get one clue for later in the session, and they won't have a nonlethal combat section if that's the case.

Vittoria Esposito

Chapter 2.2: City on Fire Water

City on Fire Water is a bistro bar located 5 to 10 minutes to the northeast of Telcom's offices. An overall luxurious-looking yet not particularly expensive or big place, a bar and 10 tables for 4 to 6 chairs line it up. When the party arrives, all the tables are occupied, but they can sit in the bar. They have free roleplaying time there as well, but a notice trait roll should point out a peculiar table: a fat blonde guy with a goatee and a face tattoo of 3 babies under his right eye, wearing a suit with a Telcom pin like many others in the bar, sharing a table with 3 guys of what appears to be much iller repute. They can be dirty or overall look poor, their looks appear beyond being from outside the Telcom sprawl. They may even be from outside the city.

Whether or not the party notices the table, a bar fight breaks out before they can investigate further. How it starts is irrelevant. A drunk guy gets bumped by someone in the party, or he gropes a female member, or something being discussed causes animus with some of the patrons. What matters is, a bar fight involving the party starts and, at some point, the people in the suspicious table should leave without the party noticing.

A rogue party member going overboard and killing a patron or something similar should be punished. They can be sent to jail, flee the scene or something similar, but they can't work at Telcom any longer, and the player will have to build a new character while the GM gains a new NPC. While this module attempts to give the players freedom and railroad as little as possible, there are limits to the setting.

The GM and players are free to spend the rest of the night in any manner they desire, but the characters are supposed to be back at work by tomorrow at 8am.

Chapter 2.3: Inefficient Couriers

When the party attempts to retrieve the second server rack on Tuesday morning, it's nowhere to be found. Vittoria complains about inefficient couriers, and asks the party to get the rack from the couriers, the Isthmus Delivery Alliance (IDA), a couple of blocks from City on Fire Water. They can take a company van. In the meantime, she'll look into potential incorrectly entered forms.

At the local IDA office, a clerk is made via persuasion, intimidation or similar trait rolls, or via a small bribe, to admit the rack has been misplaced. It was last seen yesterday night in the nearest warehouse, half an hour to the north of the office, outside corporate territory. He's willing to give them a sealed document requesting the package from the warehouse lead, Joaquin Gomez. Vittoria wants the party to go pick it up.

Once the party arrives at the warehouse, they can see a server rack marked with Telcom logos, lazily being moved from an IDA van to an unmarked pickup truck. The people stealing the rack are taking their time, dropping it from time to time, drinking coffee.

Background: a disgruntled Telcom entry-level noticed a relatively old yet still quite valuable corporate server rack being moved by IDA in the company logs. He got in touch with the truckers moving the rack, and agreed to find a buyer for either the technology or the rare metals if they steal it, splitting the earnings.
The party must retrieve the rack one way or another. They can fight, intimidate, persuade or otherwise have the truckers leave the rack in their hands.

Stolen Server Rack

Chapter 2.4: Dress Up Lunch

Back at the Telcom office building, Vittoria asks them for details. If they tell her of the Telcom guy they saw yesterday night, they'll later see him leaving the building accompanied by two security guards. Vittoria is very pleased with them, and tells them she'll leave the menial job of data copying to a different team, proudly letting them know she can brag about her subordinates. In the meantime, she invites them out for lunch, and they can celebrate throughout the rest of the day.

Session 3:

Julieta of the Ghost

Chapter 3.1: No Children

As Vittoria and the party are grabbing some lunch, an affable and handsome, apparently unaugmented Telcom exec should join them. Vittoria was bragging about her team earlier, so he got intrigued and looked further into it. He's the one who pulled the trigger on the mole from the heist in the previous session, and if Vittoria is fine with it (she is), he wants the help of the party with a project under his wing.

On the surface, Giorgio is currently spearheading a buyout for a growing chain of gyms in the city. In private however, once Vittoria is out of sight, speaking either to one of the characters, some of them or the whole party, he explains the buyout is just an excuse: his wife, Julieta, who he suspects of cheating on him, attends this chain, called Sweat Club. While the party is tasked to go to the gym's branches around the city, auditing inventory and any accounting irregularities while keeping Giorgio informed via TAP, there's a second task. Off the books and with a reward of 1,000 credits each, they're to find evidence of Julieta's betrayal, and with whom, for potential divorce proceedings.

Giorgio and Julieta Botran

Chapter 3.2: Sweat Club

Starting on Wednesday, the party is tasked with auditing the Sweat Club gym chain. They must visit multiple branches around the city. Notice, research, hacking or similar trait rolls uncover several irregularities when it comes to inventory, membership and cash flow. The party is instructed to keep Giorgio up to date via TAP but, if Giorgio is contacted 3 times, he'll just ask them to keep their findings updated in a shared folder and database, and to never confront the personnel. If they decide to confront the personnel anyway, the GM can decide to initiate combat rounds.

Chapter 3.3: Perspiration Vapor

Whenever the party visits a branch outside corporate territory, any character that received information on Julieta from Giorgio should be prompted with a Notice +2 trait roll to ascertain Julieta's presence, prompting them to gather evidence. Uninformed characters can roll base Notice too, as she sticks out like a sore thumb in a place like this.

Julieta enters a private sauna together with 5 burly, heavily augmented men. If the party spies on them, she's getting gangbanged. If any of the player characters confront them, the GM can initiate a combat round between the 5 men and the party if desired.

Chapter 3.4: Ardour

The party should inform Giorgio. If they don't let him know for some reason (ie they were planning on extorting Julieta), let the party know their evidence was saved in the shared folder.

Once Giorgio has the evidence, he'll confront Julieta with divorce papers. Where and how depends on the actions of the party and up to the GM's discretion. For example, if they're stealthy and they let Giorgio know by TAP or if they simply don't tell Giorgio, he'll take a bike to the gym, get together with the party, wait for Julieta to come out, and then confront her. If the party went back to Telcom to let him know, he'll take them back to the gym to wait for her to leave the premises. If the party blows its cover, we can have Julieta herself visit Giorgio's office.

Julieta will then attempt to emasculate Giorgio. She'll complain about his workaholic tendencies, about his dislike of augmentations categorizing it as mediocrity, while at the same time calling him a hypocrite for working with Telcom. She'll sign the papers, she doesn't care, she wants out and doesn't want his money.

Giorgio takes it all in stride, stoically. His demeanor never changes. In private however, he still loved her so he feels betrayed, depressed and defeated. Whether he shows it to the party is the GM's decision, but in public, he is unfazed.

Public Humiliation

Chapter 3.5: Polish The Chrome, Get a Crack on Your Dome

A few days later, while the party works on collating the collected data, a snuff film where a clearly now tattooed and augmented Julieta gets brutally gang raped and killed in full red background starts circulating.

Background: Julieta's divorce stopped the cash flow for the revolutionaries, previously originating from what she took from Giorgio. So they've found a new way to get immediate money out of her: a snuff film.

Giorgio can't be found for a few days. If the party gets worried about him and is persistent enough, he can let them know he just needs some alone time right now. A few days later, he comes back with the Blood Club quest.

Session 4:

Blood Club

Chapter 4.1: Snuff

While Giorgio's demeanor hasn't changed, he's more motivated when it comes to fixing the gym chain issues. He's already authorized the Telcom buyout, and the player's research from the previous session has left something clear: there is an insurgent cell operating in these gyms, including both employees and patrons. And this cell isn't only operating with funds and equipment funneled from the chain. It also killed Julieta.

The party is tasked with compiling a list of names: the patrons and employees belonging to this cell.

Chapter 4.2: Kumite

The characters' Origins (ie Insurgent), Edges (ie Contacts), previous interactions (Joaquin Gomez, Soraya Sambalá) or Smarts-related rolls (ie Research) tie Julieta's film with Blood Club, a group that creates and sells snuff media. Rape and murder is an anomaly, if a lucrative one. They normally distribute video of illegal fights to death.

The Blood Club illegal fight ring operates in a parking lot, in the basement of the first Sweat Club gym ever opened, at the northeast of the Telcom sprawl, in what is now non-corpo land: an abandoned sprawl, which 15 years ago was occupied by Efficient Operations, a corporation that decided to leave the region.

The party is free to choose how they'll infiltrate the next fight. They could leverage their past, extort or convince a member to vouch for them, or simply pay their way in. Some of the players may decide to be booked as fighters: that's fine too.

Chapter 4.3: Interred

This basement is full of both outdated cameras and the dregs of society. Long gone are the clean-cut streets of the Telcom sprawl, full of Human 2.0s. If anything, Human 2.0s are the minority here, with the exception of high-stakes gamblers. The majority of its visitors is comprised of Hybrids indulging in drugs and alcohol in a defeated manner, while Human 1.0s, Cyborgs, Bioroids, and even a few Androids line the rest of the place. The thread in common is glaring discontent with their life, and hate for corporations.

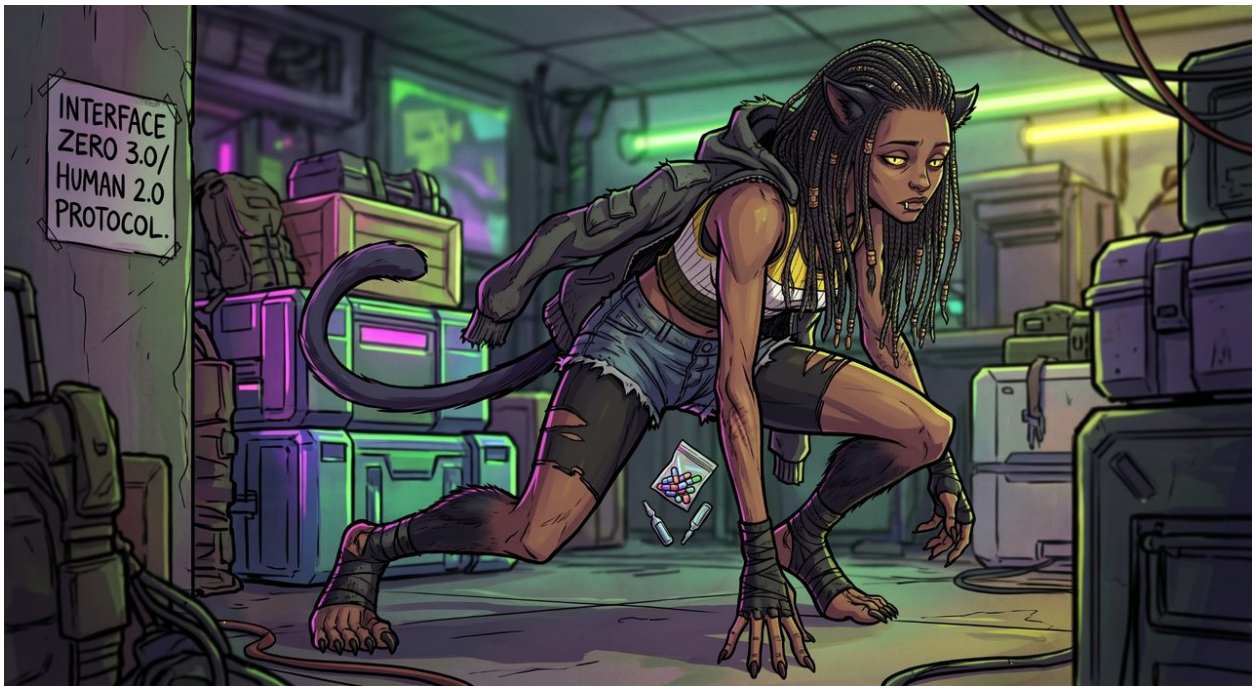

Blood Club Death Fight Ring

If Soraya Sambalá has not been introduced, she can make her debut during this section. She is selling her cheap fixes out of a duffle bag to the spectators and fighters. If she learns the party is related to Telcom in any way, she will turn excessively friendly, offering steep discounts or even free samples. Anything to add any of them to her contact list.

The party can join the ring in this section if they want to or deem it necessary, but their actual mission is detailed in Chapter 5: Guts.

If the characters display outright contempt for the corporations by passing Persuasion rolls, or if they somehow manage to stealth their way to a closed office at the opposite end of the basement or use technology to spy on it, they can get more lore from Chapter 4.4: Red Room. If they do not, skip Chapter 4.4 and proceed directly to Chapter 4.5: Guts.

Soraya Sambalá

Chapter 4.4: Red Room

The party recognizes the room: it's where Julieta got raped and murdered. While her assailants weren't in the ring, all of them are here now.

The Red Room, with red walls, red tables, red chairs, is the recruitment grounds for a guerrilla cell being formed around the region. The Blood Club top brass use the illegal fights to recruit the discontent locals. Their heavily communist discourse centered on jealousy and hatred for a perceived corporate colonialism also explains their motivation for the snuff films and embezzlement of Sweat Club assets: funding the guerrilla cell's ambitions.

The party can decide whether to fight the 20-odd people present, which includes some of the top brass and new recruits, but even if they do, the roster has over 100 names.

Chapter 4.5: Guts

Whether any players joined the illegal fights or the recruitment session, their direct mission consists of collecting the roster of Blood Club members related to Sweat Club. The ring does keep an unsecured roster the party can attempt to steal, both as an unencrypted spreadsheet in their TAP servers and as physical prints of said spreadsheet. The players could gather this information stealthily, violently or via persuasion, as decided by the GM and how the session develops.

Chapter 4.6: Sand

Once the party delivers the extracted roster, Giorgio receives the data with noticeable yet measured satisfaction. A Notice trait roll will discover his eyes denote him as ecstatic, however. He reviews the ledger with stoic composure; whether the runners gunned down the specific insurgents who butchered Julieta or bypassed them entirely makes no difference to him. His retribution is an administrative guarantee: with the roster in hand, he will forward every name to an elite private military contractor retained by the Botran family to quietly liquidate the entire cell, though this is not information he shares unless pressed.

If the party offers further assistance with the fallout, he politely declines for the moment, assuring them in his customary calm yet friendly manner that he appreciates the offer and will try to find a way to fit them in the process, but for now, the matter is closed and requires internal discretion. He excuses himself to begin coordinating logistics.

Session 5:

Jaguar Spotting

Chapter 5.1: Adults

Giorgio remains occupied coordinating the private extermination of the Blood Club roster. Before the team can pursue the matter further, an urgent directive that Vittoria has received from floor 47 takes priority. Vargas flags an ongoing logistical anomaly that requires the specific talents of Vittoria's dynamic team, whose reputation for successful auditing was proven during the server retrieval and gym investigations. Vittoria instructs the party to table any outside business with Giorgio, emphasizing that this request comes directly from upstairs.

The exoskeleton research division relies on Neuro-Dyne, an expensive clinical neural stabilizer imported from a European pharmaceutical syndicate to counteract the debilitating side effects of Synap-Tork, an aggressive enhancer used during neural rig calibrations. Beyond military prototypes, low doses of the compound are essential for stabilizing experimental bio-synthetic grafts, making the local supply quietly vital to Vittoria's ongoing porcelain skin treatments.

To bypass import tariffs, Telcom routes shipments through Farmacias Gattopardo, an established regional franchise Telcom intends to absorb in a hostile buyout. Over the past three delivery cycles, crates of Neuro-Dyne have vanished between the port intake and the central dispensary, yet Gattopardo's manifest logs claim every sealed pallet was transferred intact. Vargas refuses to finalize the acquisition until the leak is identified and rectified, tasking the party, via Vittoria, with auditing Gattopardo's distribution hubs to determine whether the franchise leadership is siphoning inventory, or if outside elements are bleeding the supply line.

Optionally, if the party has built a friendly rapport with Soraya during previous sessions, she reaches out via encrypted TAP comms to the member she trusts most. Knowing they operate within Telcom, she swallows her pride to plead for a single ten-vial treatment box of Neuro-Dyne. She offers to pay triple whatever credits the team has spent on her street fixes, promising installments or collateral if more is needed. The desperation in her voice is palpable: her neural receptor decay is accelerating. If pressed for why a street dealer needs a military-grade stabilizer, she openly reveals her past as a discarded Telcom Golemmech test pilot as outlined in her character description, giving the party an immediate, human reason to track down the stolen crates beyond corporate compliance. She has attempted to obtain ampules from the streets, but has been thoroughly priced out. The gangs have offered a choice she has been unwilling to take, still lucid enough despite her desperation: she could join a gang for the treatment, get jaguar grafts on top of her black panther hybridization. She chooses to trust the party instead.

Chapter 5.2: On the Fritz

The party has free roleplay space to investigate Farmacias Gattopardo. The central hub connecting the franchise with Telcom sits inside a dense industrial logistics park along the southern border of the Telcom sprawl. The warehouse itself is staffed entirely by feline hybrids. Defying the typical hybrid trend of displaying their patterns for street fashion, these workers wear sterile nurse fatigues over high turtlenecks, deliberately concealing most of their fur.

A Notice roll with a raise allows an operative to catch a glimpse of uncovered spotted fur along a worker's neck or wrist. A subsequent Common Knowledge roll identifies the distinct, unnatural coat pattern: genetic blotches shaped like a grinning clown mouth and round nose, the trademark cosmetic splice of the local Mara Circo gang.

The hybrid crew acts cooperative on the surface, granting the auditors access to their terminals while claiming the local TAP relay has been on the fritz all morning. A successful Hacking or Repair roll restores the terminal feed, revealing that the digital manifest looks spotless on paper.

Chapter 5.3: Theft and Traffic in the Moon Valley

A physical audit of the loading bay tells a different story. The cargo bay of the delivery truck holds fewer pallets than the manifest accounts for. A Notice roll outside the bay spots two heavy, Telcom-branded composite crates sitting low in the back seat of a beat-up sedan parked across the street.

If, at any point, the party acts suspicious towards the staff or starts moving towards the sedan, the two staff overseeing them will attack with light pistols and augmented fangs and claws serving as natural weapons, initiating a combat section.

Chapter 5.4: Chce Miec Kopa Jak Pantera

The gunfire from the warehouse loading dock alerts the lookout parked across the street. The three remaining gangers on the other side of the street, originally waiting for more crates to be loaded, dive into the sedan as its engine roars, screeching tires against the pavement while the car speeds south toward the uncontrolled urban streets.

This encounter utilizes the Chases & Vehicles ruleset from page 113 of the Savage Worlds Adventure Edition core rules. The party must pursue the sedan through congested streets, cracked asphalt, and narrow alleys dividing the corporate sprawl from the independent, abandoned sections of the city.

If the players fail the chase rolls, the GM can deploy an unexpected collision to keep the action moving. A flatbed truck hauling six live, organic cows, an exorbitantly rare, surreal sight for the Interface Zero setting, swerves erratically across the broken pavement to avoid an open pothole. The sudden spectacle forces the fleeing sedan to veer sharply, careening over the curb and smashing into a dry, decommissioned fire hydrant.

If the gangers manage to escape completely without crashing, skip Chapter 5.5: Guilty Ocelots and proceed directly to the corporate debriefing in Chapter 5.6: Catnip.

Chapter 5.5: Guilty Ocelots

If the party overtakes the sedan during the chase or corners the wreckage at the hydrant, this section serves as a second combat encounter. If the sedan crashed, the three feline gangers emerge disoriented and start the first round Shaken, but fight viciously to cover their escape using light pistols, augmented fangs, and retractable claws.

Once the gangers are subdued or neutralized, the party can inspect the vehicle. The impact ruptured the seals on one of the composite crates, shattering several glass ampoules and soaking the upholstery in stabilizer solution.

Each crate holds 270 clinical vials for a total shipment of 540. With transit damage already evident, the party can quietly pocket the ten-vial treatment box requested by Soraya without raising corporate suspicion. On paper, the missing units easily blend into the write-off for damaged inventory during the recovery.

If any gangers are captured alive, an Intimidation or Persuasion roll reveals their original motive: the gang began stealing Neuro-Dyne to suppress the excruciating chronic nerve pain caused by their cheap, bootleg back-alley cosmetic hybridization procedures. Realizing its potency on the street however, they began scalping leftover ampoules at ten times the market price, creating the predatory shortage that left Soraya priced out of surviving her own neural decay.

Confronting Mara Circo gangers after a chase

Chapter 5.6: Catnip

Once the recovery is logged, the party returns to the Telcom office building to close out the audit manifests with Vittoria. Learning that an administrative errand spiraled into a high-speed vehicle pursuit and gang shootout leaves her visibly mortified. Distressed that she placed her team in mortal danger once again, she insists on caring for them personally.

In the private executive lounge, Vittoria sets out an elaborate spread she assembled herself: artisan paninis loaded with genuine organic beef, cured salmon, roast turkey, and crisp hydroponic greens, goods that cost an obscene fortune for her, an amount they'd earn from a few months of work.

While the party eats, Vittoria insists that corporate can wait and promises them a full week-long retreat away from the sprawl to decompress. She places a quick TAP comms call to Giorgio to request administrative travel clearances and the keys to a coastal property. Giorgio agrees instantly with customary, breezy generosity, offering unrestricted access to one of the Botran family's secluded private beach houses.

Chapter 5.7: Lean and Clean

If the operatives secured the ten vials of Neuro-Dyne and chose to aid Soraya, they can deliver the treatment back in the abandoned north sprawl she inhabits, though if contacted via TAP comms first, she will gladly meet them wherever they feel secure.

She waits among the concrete ruins of the former Private Conduct facilities, shivering under the severe tremors of advanced neural receptor decay. Handing over the sealed case brings immediate, visible relief. Taking the first dose on the spot halts the chemical fog and stabilizes her frayed motor pathways, allowing her feline grace to return.

True to her word, Soraya offers whatever savings she scraped together from dealing bootleg meth. If the players decline her money, she accepts the gesture with quiet, stunned gratitude.

With her dependency broken and her mind clear, she admits she has nothing left to prove in the Valley of the Moon. She packs her minimal belongings to catch a commercial bus heading northeast toward the coast, ready to undertake the ten-hour journey back to the Old Docks. Though returning home means facing the family whose bridges she burned, bearing the permanent leopard ears, claws, and coat of her corporate hubris, she chooses the bitter taste of reconciliation over dying in a cold highland alley.

Session 6:

In the Kak'ik

Chapter 6.1: In the Middle of the Swaying Wind

As thanks for their help during the previous two sessions, Giorgio invites the party to a beach retreat, in a villa owned by the Botran family. To justify a week-long trip not affecting their work hours, he'll have them audit one of the Botran sugarcane plantations that Telcom has not audited yet, located half an hour from the beach: Finca Kak'ik. They'll get all week to work on the audit, and they'll have the freedom to move from the plantation to the beach house and nearby town as they see fit. Hell, Giorgio himself needs some time off, so he'll join them on the trip. Vittoria must stay in the office as she's got important, immediate tasks, but she promises to hang out soon.

Taking a company van that Giorgio will fit with a fridge full of alcohol and snacks early in the morning of the following day, the party will have some free roleplay time while they roadtrip to a southwestern coast located about 4 hours away. Giorgio will refuse to drive if asked, as he'll be occupied drinking and just being good company, though he IS talking about Julieta a bit too much. How some of his best memories with her are from their trips to the villa, to the beach. How Julieta herself liked to visit the area alone while he was out of the country for work, taking advantage of the nice hotel and spa chains present around the coast. His demeanor is still overall stoic and good-natured, but he's hurt, missing her despite everything. The wound is fresh, and although he doesn't particularly break, he does feel comfortable with the party due to the friendship they've developed, feeling free to open up.

His trip will regrettably be cut short midway during the drive however, as he gets an urgent TAP call about a missing shipment of construction materials that Julieta's brother, who they decided not to fire, has stolen. This shipment is intended for an improved financial district in Central, so he'll have to fly northeast to get everything aligned. Chugging a Yellow Levantamuertos, a synthetic energy drink that offers to immediately remove the effects of alcohol, leaves him with an immediate hangover. He'll prepare access documents for the party to show in the plantation and to the villa's servants, and will ask them to leave him at the nearest service station, located in the middle of vast grain fields swaying in the wind, vibrant in green, to wait for a company helicopter to fly him to the Central offices, promising to rejoin the party as soon as he's put out the fire.

It's up to the party to decide whether to hit the villa or the plantation first. The plantation is nearest, and is their intended destination for the rest of the session, but if they decide to visit the villa first, the GM can decide the details. It's a nice tropical villa with a private beach, manned by an old maid and a gardner, who both dress and act smart. Players can take free roleplaying time in the villa, which is an unimportant narrative device.

Chapter 6.2: The Crossing

The party is supposed to reach the plantation eventually. While the temperature is overall high in the coastline, the humid heat in the environment only makes the smells exponentially stinkier as they get near the plantation, from a faint sweet smell to an overwhelming acrid stench, a complete contrast from the clean streets and offices of the Telcom sprawl. While the smell of blood was present during Blood Club, it takes the first row in this session. Once the party takes a crossing into the fenced off plantation, the oppresive stench of rot is a constant of life. A Common Knowledge or similar roll will conclude that's how sugarcane plantations smell, but a raise will uncover actual blood smell hiding underneath. If, while inside the plantation, the party attempts to send or retrieve data from the TAP network, they'll be unable to link comms.

A security guard sporting an old AK-47 will welcome them. If asked about the smell, he'll explain it's normal for a sugarcane plantation, but if pressed about the blood smell, he'll say it likely arises from butchering pigs. It sounds expensive for the setting but, considering Giorgio was supposed to join them, this explains how an organic ingredient has been wasted. If the guard is asked about the missing comm links, he'll tell them there's a faulty antenna, and the vegetation makes it hard for local TAP systems to connect. He could even offer to take them to the antenna if they're offering to fix it.

As soon as the party lowers its guard, the security guard will double-cross them. He's a guerrilla fighter who, together with 4 other insurgents joining the fray, goes into a combat section with the party.

Chapter 6.3: Butterfly Lily

After the combat encounter, the party can explore the plantation, where they'll find corpses of both local farm hands and guerrillas. Under the antenna tower is a small shack containing an archaic convenience store branded as "La Mariposa". A Notice roll will cause the party to hear a panting woman hiding at the back of the shack, where they find a local laying in a puddle of blood, dying from blood loss. A successful Healing roll or the use of a medkit will stop the bleeding and stabilize the woman, who will identify herself as Lili, the shopkeeper. She's thankful to the party, and relates the background for this session:

During the last fortnight, a small group of guerrillas throwing around the young lady's name came to the plantation, demanding refuge and food, and recruiting the locals to their cause, particularly the youngest, most naive ones.
At some point, a fight started between the bigwigs in the plantation and the guerrillas, who promptly massacred those who opposed them. The guerillas destroyed the antenna after the fight, and killed anyone who opposed or attempted to flee the plantation. Lili is not aware of Julieta's demise. How the antenna was decommissioned is up to the GM, in order for the players to have either more or less difficulty fixing it with their abilities. For example, a character who excels at Athletics might have an easier time fixing the antenna itself, while lacking such a character may have a more permissive GM make the damaged object a terminal on the first floor of the building. Maybe you'd just want one cable to be cut - it's the GM's choice.
Ever since, the guerrillas have trained and indoctrinated their new recruits. Their methods have been brutal: intense military excursions and recitations of socialist maxims and anti-corpo sentiment, gradually devolving into bullying those falling behind. Ironically, Raine del Sol, a heavily augmented and burly female Human 1.0 wearing Better-U Self-Actualization Package Biotech and Kenta Cyber Dynamics Dreadnaught Cyber System Cybertech augmentations paid by the Botran corporation, who originally worked the fields, was the most fervent believer in the guerrillas' cause out of all the new conscripts, but her limited cognitive capabilities left her underperforming during the exercises, in turn making the leaders bully her the most relentlessly.
Less than an hour ago, Raine snapped. It was like a demon had taken over her. She shot or maimed friend or foe, killing almost everyone in the area. Just a few guerrillas (which the party confronted in the previous chapter) were left standing. Lili woke up, but she was bleeding out, so she went back to the store to find a way to close her wounds. She doesn't know Raine's current location or state.
As background unknown to Lili: Julieta wasn't visiting the area alone. She was having thrysts at the seaside hotels in the area with her guerrilla-related lovers. She had visited the plantation with Giorgio in previous trips, noting its lucrative potential and then relating this to the guerrillas. When they killed her and had no way to extract more money from her besides the snuff film, they decided to extract it from the plantation.

Lili from La Mariposa

Chapter 6.4: Sunlight Raine

The party can fail to meet Lili. While meeting her is preferable, the session can continue in her absence. It just means they won't receive lore.

If the characters at any point decide to leave the plantation, if they attempt to fix the antenna, or as soon as they step foot outside La Mariposa, they'll be attacked by Raine. If the players attempt to reason with her, hack her TAP, or any other such ways to avoid a fight, they'll fail, as Raine has entered Cyber Psychosis berserk mode. A combat section ensues.

If the players feel bad for Raine and she is only incapacitated and not eliminated, Giorgio will hire her as a bodyguard for his nearby state.

Chapter 6.5: Annihilation

Once the party has incapacitated or escaped from Raine, they can try to fix the antenna via trait rolls such as Repair. If they leave the plantation and go back to the main road, they can get TAP signal too. After they inform Giorgio or VIttoria, they'll be asked to go back to the office building as soon as possible. Giorgio will go back from Central to the Moon Valley as soon as he can, and he is thankful for the party's information and actions.

Session 7:

2Q95

Chapter 7.1: The Yellow Pope

When the party arrives back at the Valley of the Moon Telcom offices, Giorgio is still in Central. Vittoria isn't answering comms either, but their TAP systems turn red harkening back to Session 1, as Vargas is calling them to his office in floor 47.

If the players failed Session 1, Vargas will be accompanied by two bodyguards wearing generic suits and visitor passes instead of Telcom security badges: Bruno Barreto and Stefano Silva, the bodyguard and scientist/gunner from Session 1, now wearing more augmentations and different faces and personalities. They are standing behind Vargas, and aren't supposed to interact with the players, only to provide flavor. If the players succeeded in Session 1 and are still using the premades, Vargas is alone.

Vargas will let them know Vittoria is busy, but he has an important mission for them: a local gang, the Mara Circo, has stolen an important Telcom prototype they're currently keeping in a tent outside corporate control, in between the Telcom and Daily sections of the city. The party is tasked with retrieving the prototype from this infamous extortionist gang that obtained the prototype from a Telcom employee they were extorting.

Chapter 7.2: Yellow Rainbow

A few blocks after leaving the Telcom perimeter, the GM calls for Notice rolls at -2. Operatives who succeed catch the exact moment reality fractures. The vivid neon and asphalt tones drain into a sickening, high-contrast monochrome yellow, while ghostly, translucent projections of breaching humpback whales, orcas, and swarms of echolocating bats ripple across the crumbling facades and empty alleys. Operatives who fail perceive this identical yellow dreamscape, but register it as completely routine, brushing off any warnings from their panicked squadmates as unhinged paranoia.

The cracked pavement under the vehicle transforms into a polished, seamless yellow brick road. Rather than an inescapable script, the distortion operates as a weaponized neural gradient. The unshielded prototype floods the district with high-frequency neuro-acoustic resonance, hijacking the TAP transceivers in every brain within a 500-meter radius.

Attempting to brake, reverse, or turn away from the anomaly causes violent spatial dissonance: optical feeds show the van backing out, but vestibular implants spin, and the screeching static in their audio processors spikes into blinding migraines that inflict an automatic level of Fatigue on anyone trying to flee. Moving forward down the yellow road is the only vector that quiets the cognitive feedback.

Stepping outside the van is equally punishing. The vehicle's reinforced chassis acts as a makeshift dampener; stepping onto the asphalt exposes operatives to raw, unfiltered sensory bleed, forcing an immediate Spirit roll to avoid being Shaken by phantom nausea. The yellow road funnels them forward not because they lack choices, but because pushing through to destroy the broadcast source is the only way to save their frying nervous systems.

Background: Following the events of Session 1, Vargas secured Karol Oshima's research archives. With the lead scientist dead, Vargas established an unsanctioned skunkworks cell outside Telcom oversight to exploit the stolen work. If the prologue team failed in Session 1, Vargas repurposed Dario, Stefano, and Braulio for this lab, placing Finnley in charge and Bruno as security muscle. This explains why the high-profile terrorist cell remained invisible after the Daily Neural incident, shielded by Vargas with reconstructive surgery, forged identities, and a secluded research bunker.

While Vargas skimmed portions of the genetics data to accelerate his exoskeleton division and earn his promotion to Floor 47, his private obsession was Oshima's cetacean echolocation and sonar mapping protocols. He sought to invert the neural feedback mechanisms used in combat exoskeletons, developing a wireless rig capable of diving into an unconsenting target's conscious memory via TAP frequencies to extract blackmail and corporate leverage.

The project fell apart when an extorted research tech cut a deal with the Mara Circo gang. The device was nowhere near stable calibration. When the gangers jammed the prototype into an outdated TAP 1.0 antenna array using raw industrial voltage and reversed polarity, the unit ruptured into an acoustic sensory bomb. Instead of extracting thoughts, it broadcast an uncontrollable 500-meter neural feedback loop, blending the memories, phobias, and sensory inputs of everyone caught inside its blast radius into an active waking hallucination.

Chapter 7.3: Psychosis Agent

Once the party reaches the Mara Circo tent, they'll initiate combat against 8 of its members. They won't see them as the normal hybrid ocelot gangers however. They'll see them as remnants of the psyche of the other characters in the table. For example, if a player character has a Phobia hindrance related to spiders, a different character will see the gangers as spiders, or if a character has a Delusions hindrance manifested as conspiracy theories, a different player may see lizard people.

The last ganger left alive however, the Wild Card, will be seen as someone deeply related to the character. For example, if a character showed elevated empathy towards Raine, the Wild Card will be seen as Raine. If a character showed particular friendship with Giorgio or Vittoria, or if they had particular animosity toward Julieta, that's who they'll see as the Wild Card.

Chapter 7.4: Perfect Yellow

Once the characters have defeated the gangers, they'll need to find and turn off the device. The GM is encouraged to make the augmented reality more surrealist and impressionist as the player characters get closer to the device, and less so once they go farther away. The GM can quote previous sessions, different modules the characters have played, even different tabletop games they've played together or details from the player's real life. If media assets such as recordings are created, that's even better, but this module can't provide them as they're supposed to be tailored to each player.

Once the surrealism has reached a crescendo and the GM feels it's enough, the party can turn off the device easily, by pressing a button that, while small, provides a yellow as intense as the noon sun. The device is a 100cm x 100cm yellow box with a small black button, a small antenna and ports.

The Yellow Box

Chapter 7.5: Reign in Hell

If the party attempts to contact Vargas, his TAP line goes dead. Moments later, an encrypted ping arrives from Giorgio, requesting an immediate meeting in the department's third-floor office alongside Vittoria.

When the operatives walk in, the room is quiet save for Giorgio pouring glasses of vintage dark rum. He explains with effortless calm that Floor 47 has fallen. Armed with the audit trails, casualty manifests, and logistical data compiled by the team across the past few weeks, the Botran consortium presented the regional board with irrefutable proof of Vargas running unsanctioned operations, embezzlement, and reckless corporate negligence.

Giorgio does not simply announce the victory; he invites the team to finalize it. He slides a pair of magnetic security restraints and an executive revocation slate across the desk. Escorted by Giorgio, the party is brought up to Floor 47 one last time to personally strip Vargas of his administrative privileges, slap the restraint collars on him, and march their former boss down the executive concourse toward an unmarked Telcom prisoner transport bound for a black-site penitentiary.

Once the arrest is secured, Giorgio formalizes their new status. The Department of Dynamic Operational Logistics now answers directly to him. Their salaries are doubled on the spot, and they are granted complete autonomy to pursue their own corporate or personal projects at their own pace, retaining their credentials, budget, and office. No more summons to Floor 13 or Floor 47; Giorgio has no formal desk and will simply drop by to check in on them whenever an audit requires a deft touch.

If the operatives present the yellow box and describe the hallucinatory waking nightmare in the Sprawl, Giorgio reacts with genuine, polite astonishment. He takes custody of the unit to have his private engineers safely dismantle it, assuring them that whatever deranged neural-diving projects Vargas pursued with Oshima's stolen notes will be incinerated alongside the rest of his discarded research. If the original premades were lost during Session 1, their final fate can be tied to Vargas's dismantled black-ops bunker or left an ominous cold case.

The abrupt tonal shift from weaponized AR madness to quiet, sunlit corporate ascendancy is jarring and sterile, a deliberate reminder that in the Isthmus, existential horrors are swept clean the moment a higher balance sheet takes control. Yet an observant operative will notice a subtle change in their section's hierarchy, as well as the room: while Vittoria smiles warmly at the team's victory, she watches them with a quiet, maternal detachment, her thoughts already drifting beyond the Isthmus following a life-altering corporate offer she accepted only hours prior.

Chapter 7.6: Brisbane

Vittoria is leaving the Isthmus Free Zone. If the players aren't aware of her ailment, they're free to assume it's because she doesn't need to work for Vargas any longer, maybe she was being extorted or something, but the reality is sweeter: Vittoria's cyber skin tests were concluded while the party was in Finca Kak'ik, and she's been offered an executive promotion to Telcom's Brisbane branch in Australia. Giorgio doesn't let her debate whether to leave or not when Vargas' ousting is being machinated. She deserves the promotion and relocation.

The party, Giorgio and Vittoria leave for the coastal vacation offered in Chapter 6.1: In The Middle of the Swaying Wind at last. In Giorgio's villa, they are served by Lili, who has been hired as a maid after the events of Session 6: In the Kak'ik left her scarred and unable to work at the plantation.

At some point during their celebration, a corporate helicopter picks Vittoria up from the beach barbecue they're having, and the module closes with the party having drinks and organic meat, seeing the helicopter leave in the horizon.

Appendix 1:

NPC Descriptions

David Vargas

A local executive rapidly rising in the corporate ladder, Vargas' success stems from the cutthroat yet effective management he's provided in the exoskeleton research division of Telcom's weapons section. While not particularly handsome, wearing prominent brand-name cybertech and a well groomed beard, he nonetheless keeps a very professional look and unapproachable demeanor.

During Session 1, Vargas' office is located on floor 13 of the Telcom office building. After Session 1, due to his exploitation of Karol Oshima's research for further improvement of the exoskeleton research division he manages, he moves to floor 47, still in the same small city of the Isthmus. His Overconfident hindrance sees him rising the ranks first to Central, and then all the way to the CEO seat in Canada.

Oshima's research is extensive however, so Vargas contracts a private team, separate from Telcom (which can be comprised of the premade characters if the players failed Session 1), to develop a system intended to "dive" into people's consciousness, combining tests on the sonar and echolocation abilities from cetaceans and bats made by Oshima, with nervous system control via TAP systems his Telcom team has used to improve the response of exoskeletons, in reverse. Exploiting systems the external team isn't perfectly familiar with backfires however, jumpstarting the 2095 Session.

Telcom is aware of his wild card nature, as this is not the first disaster he causes due to sheer ambition. Central sends in Vittoria Esposito as a spy and handler for him, although he believes she is just a test subject initially, and a subordinate later. He never learns of her real purpose.

Karol Oshima

An eminent cyber biologist famous for success in conservation efforts, Oshima had been feeling dissatisfied with his position in Daily Neural for a couple of months. A mutual acquaintance put him in touch with Vargas, who offered to drastically diminish his workload and improve his salary if he took his research in secret to Telcom.

The overworked, stressed and overstrained Oshima died a few hours before the start of the first session, after the situation triggered the cyberpsychosis homebrew rules for him. The recovered research will be used by Vargas to rise up the ranks in Telcom, and to create a prototype conscience diving device that will cause a forced augmented reality incident in the 2095 session.

Vittoria Esposito

Vittoria is one of the two nonplayer characters intended to provide respite and humanity to the module.

An executive from the central Isthmus Free Zone offices, she's been diagnosed with terminal skin cancer, propping up her Catholic upbringing into real Christian faith, making her consider Orthodoxy. On paper, in order to counter this ailment, she's moved to the Valley of the Moon offices, where Vargas' exoskeleton research may save her life.

She had taken a purely PR promotion to the Brisbane land of God and Green, to spend her last months, but when she learned of the research when her cousin, Giorgio Botran, mentioned it in passing during a family dinner in Central, she decided to trust faith and move to a small city in hopes of changing her sick skin for an experimental porcelain-like dermal augmentation. Vargas gained a test subject and a favor from Central. In turn, Central gained a handler for the wild card they'd noticed in Vargas, who wouldn't suspect Vittoria.

Introduced in Session 2: Gatos sin Reservas, she's now working as a direct manager for the Department of Dynamic Operational Logistics, responding directly to Vargas. The position is only an excuse for her presence in the Valley of the Moon offices, where she must remain while her prototype Telcom Porcelain Skin augmentation is being tested and tuned. For this reason, while Vittoria serves as a quest giver, she only gives orders and leaves the party mostly to their own devices while she "works in other tasks", these mainly being said tests and tuning.

A naturally beautiful and kind, inadvertently sensual woman in her early 30s, her augmented skin isn't immediately noticeable, but a successful notice roll should prove it's too perfect, no blemishes, no hair, no pores. At 160cm tall with 95-55-90 reverse hourglass measurements and a motherly demeanor, she should provide a psychological anchor so the characters have someone they can trust.

Once Vargas is ousted by Giorgio between Chapters 7.4: Perfect Yellow and 7.5: Reign in Hell, Vittoria debates taking the Brisbane position. Telcom is evermore insistent, as a skin cancer cured by Telcom's edge research is a better PR strategy than what they ever hoped for. Giorgio doesn't let her doubt it, and pushes her to take it, to go live calmly in the land of God and Green.

The last scene of the module has the surviving characters, their souls stained by grime and gunpowder, their bodies stained in beach sand and barbecue grease, seeing her climb a helicopter and fly towards the horizon, a scale into the corporate private plane that will see her land in Church paradise, in Australia.

Joaquin Gomez

Human 1.0 manager of the warehouse the party visits in Session 2: Gatos sin Reservas, Joaquin is a member of the neo-bolshevik guerrillas. He meets a small-time, entry-level data input employee from Telcom at the Blood Club, and they come up with a plan to steal an obsolete server, have it deleted from the corporation's database, and sell it for scrap to pay for a higher position in the guerrilla.

If confronted non-violently, Joaquin will have a +1 modifier in Persuasion, but will conversely have a -1 modifier in Intimidation. He isn't against bribery either. The other thieves will follow his lead.

Giorgio Botran

Giorgio is the heir to the Botran consortium, an old-money agro-industrial dynasty rooted in the Isthmus for generations. Originating from a historic monopoly over the country's sugarcane production and the global export of high-altitude aged dark rum, the family leveraged centuries of landed wealth into commanding stakes across regional banking, private logistics, and commercial real estate. While foreign megacorporations like Telcom hold superior military tech and orbital assets, they remain dependent on the Botran family to build their Sprawl infrastructure and secure territorial transport routes. Giorgio oversees these joint ventures, acting as the liaison between foreign corporate power and local feudal aristocracy.

Impeccably tailored in uncreased linen and smelling faintly of barrel-aged oak and dry tobacco, Giorgio looks like an oil portrait stepped out of the 1920s. The Overconfident hindrance provided by his Human 2.0 lineage manifests quietly yet in an unshakeable manner. He does not look upon the party's cybernetic augmentations or hybridization with disgust. Rather, he views them with pragmatic appreciation, seeing chrome and genetic edits as sensible, specialized tools for operatives executing dangerous corporate mandates. For himself and his bloodline however, he considers such modifications entirely beneath him. His boutique baseline genes are an aristocratic birthright, requiring no prosthetic crutch beyond the standard TAP needed to conduct business. He carried an unshakeable, naive certainty that Julieta shared this patrician pride.

Underneath the courteous manners lies a deeply wounded romantic. His marriage to Julieta was his one genuine emotional investment, and her betrayal shattered him. Julieta dismissed his natural purity as pathetic stagnation, throwing his money and her body into the arms of heavily modified insurgents who wore the raw, vulgar, inefficient modifications Giorgio only valued on hired hands. Even after her brutal murder, Giorgio quietly mourns the memory of what they shared during private road trips and quiet coastal retreats. He swallowed the humiliation without letting his public smile waver, channeling grief into cold, bureaucratic vengeance.

That quiet cruelty defines his competence. Giorgio does not yell, threaten, or flash chrome. He simply signs off on private security contracts to exterminate entire rosters of insurgents while pouring aged rum for his subordinates. His cousin Vittoria, the daughter of his dear aunt Delia, remains the sole surviving piece of his domestic world. While her synthetic porcelain skin is a quiet wound to his belief in unblemished lineage, family preservation overrides all aesthetic dogma. He steers her toward the cure, shields her from the crossfire, and pushes her onto the helicopter bound for Australia. Once she ascends to the land of God and Green, Giorgio inherits the Valley of the Moon, perfectly content to keep on reigning over an unruly, rain-slicked hell.

Julieta de Botran

Julieta met Giorgio in college. Even though Giorgio was a business major and Julieta attended political science, an economics class brought them together. A naturally beautiful, slender blonde, she wasn't unaugmented out of her own volition. It was a circumstance of her middle class family's more modest means. Giorgio saw her as a kindred spirit however, and she saw him as a meal ticket, an unlimited prospect, so she's always acted like their spirits align. Their families were happy with their almost immediate marriage after college, and her family greatly benefited from their relationship, always the first option when Botran or Telcom needed to hire someone.
After almost a decade however, no matter how comfortable her life has been since, Julieta, always spoiled, always selfish, has started to grow bored. After noticing a group of heavily augmented socialist men at the gym, she started longing for the political groups she used to be involved with before meeting Giorgio. She engraced herself with these insurgents by using her beauty, body, and the seemingly unlimited funds her husband had provided. This terrible fault of character causes her demise at the end of Session 3: Julieta of the Ghost.

Soraya Sambalá

A drug dealer the players can optionally interact with. A young Garifuna from the Old Docks region, roughly ten hours northeast of the Valley of the Moon. Her parents are part of a group of local families strongly opposed to corporate rule, yet Soraya was born a Human 2.0 after they pooled savings for the procedure, hoping her enhanced capabilities would ensure the long-term survival of their independent logistics work. Instead of fulfilling these wishes, Soraya caught the eye of a corporate manager under Vargas's exoskeleton research team, enthralled by the quick reflexes she displayed during a sanctioned Muay Thai championship, at a gym he coincidentally exercised at during his visit. Her decision to sign a corporate contract rather than work the family business caused an irreparable rift, and she left for the valley with all bridges burned behind her.

To prepare her as a first-generation test pilot for TAP-controlled Telcom Golemmechs, the corporation subjected her to an experimental hybridization protocol using imported black leopard gene-sequences. The heavy neural load of the rigs required constant administration of Synap-Tork, an intense neurotransmitter enhancer that rapidly fried her natural receptors. Overworked, sleep-deprived, and suffering from chemical burnout, her feline fight-or-flight instincts triggered during a late-night calibration, leading her to attack and severely maul an abusive manager. With cheaper, more compliant second-generation pilots ready for deployment, Telcom seized on the incident to terminate her contract. They dumped her onto the streets with only a minimal emergency buffer of enhancers to avoid immediate wrongful-death scrutiny.

Soraya has survived a couple of months by learning how to stretch her remaining supply, cooking a crude crystal knockoff that she sells as bootleg meth to afford food. She currently operates out of the abandoned buildings of Private Conduct, a corporation that abandoned its facilities north of the Telcom sprawl over a decade before the events of this module.

If the players look into synthetic street narcotics during Sessions 1 through 3, the GM is encouraged to introduce Soraya operating out of these ruins. Otherwise, their first encounter occurs in Session 4, Blood Club, where she supplies stimulants to gamblers and fighters. She briefly entered the fighting ring herself, but walked away because she could not stomach killing to survive. The guerrillas who manage the club find it more lucrative to levy a cut of her sales than force her to fight, and Soraya remains entirely unaware of the venue's underlying political motives.

Soraya takes on a larger, though still optional, role in Session 5, Jaguar Spotting. Telcom has started buying crates of Neuro-Dyne, a clinical drug capable of reversing the neural receptor decay caused by Synap-Tork. Parts of the shipments of this compound are being systematically siphoned by Mara Circo, who use it as an anesthetic for their illicit, home-brewed ocelot splices.

Soraya learns through the grapevine that a full treatment of ten vials can cure her dependency, and is trying to save up to obtain them from the gang, who are charging exorbitantly for her means. A junkie once mentioned a cousin of his who used to be addicted to Synap-Tork, but he got a full treatment of Neuro-Dyne in Australia which cured him of his addiction and neural damage, for an exorbitant travel price. This in turn caused the cousin to be killed by money lenders instead, but this also gave Soraya the information she needed for hope, which led her to investigate the compound and find a corporate fluff article made by Telcom, boasting of their intentions of gaining the local supply route to make "treatment for employees suffering from work accidents" more viable. This has made her desperate for a Telcom hook.

When Vittoria tasks the players with investigating the theft, Soraya will approach them if they have earned her trust, pleading for a single treatment box of 10 vials. If the players deliver the treatment throughout the module, either in Session 5: Jaguar Spotting or later, she takes the treatment, overcomes her pride, and takes a commercial bus back to the Old Docks, bearing the visible ears, claws, and feline traits that mark the permanent cost of her decisions. If the players ignore her plight, the GM can leave her dealing on the streets until the neural decay takes her life in a cold highland alley.

Synap-Tork effects: it causes immediate focus (+3 modifier to Notice rolls for one hour), but continued use causes severe addiction and damage to the nervous system. In preactice, it's Adderal on steroids.

Neuro-Dyne effects: A combination of GABAergig hyperpolarization, pathological NMDA channel blockads against excitotoxic calcium burn, and synthetic neurotrophin peptides driving rapid synaptogenesis and peripheral nerve-interface knitting, in efficient succession, Neuro-Dyne can be used for a variety of purposes, including but not limited to: estabilizing the effects of Synap-Tork from the system and even flushing out its secondary effects; minimizing the pain of unregulated hybridization; and improving the gelling of cyberware adoption by the body. Its continued, unregulated irresponsible use may cause the same adverse effects as abusing substances such as Benzodiazepines, however.

Neo Bolshevik Guerrillas

Ever since the Second Civil Wars were extinguished in the 2060s, not all of the masses from the Isthmus are happy with their lot. While hatred for the corporations runs rampant around the unaffiliated population, some of its sentiment has also been extended to low-tier employees, particularly those who have come in contact with the list of revolutions arising from Europe, though not those fleeing from them.

The rise and prompt extinction of guerrilla cells has been a constant in the area, and 2095 is no exception.

The Streets Don't Forget

Lili from La Mariposa

Lili Penpen is a 43 year-old store clerk who has worked for the Botran consortium for 8 years together with her husband, a farm hand who died when the guerrillas originally took over the plantation, as he was one of the men who opposed their incursion. She represents the old world - an unaugmented, poor yet earnest woman working a convenience store desk inside a plantation.

If the players heal her, they can take her back to the Valley of the Moon or leave her at the plantation, it's up to their decision. Giorgio will hire her as a maid for his villa regardless, so they'll get to meet her again in Chapter 7.6: Brisbane.

Raine del Sol

Raine was never very smart, but she was always quite strong, particularly for a woman. The Botran consortium saw potential in her when she started working at the plantation as a farm hand half a year ago at 17, as a work mule if anything, so they overstrain her with the Better-U Self-Actualization Package Biotech and Kenta Cyber Dynamics Dreadnaught Cyber System Cybertech augmentations her manager had seen her eyeing out, tripling her yield and tying her down to the plantation with a 5-year loan.

She quickly gels with the heavily yet cheaply augmented guerrillas that take over the plantation, but they lose respect for her when, despite the augmentations, she's consistently at the bottom of their training. This leads to constant harassment which eventually triggers her Cyber Psychosis.

If the players only incapacitate yet don't kill her, they can take her back to the Valley of the Moon or leave her at the plantation, it's up to their decision. Giorgio will hire her as a bodyguard for his villa regardless, so they'll get to meet her again in Chapter 7.6: Brisbane. Her cyberpsychosis will be countered through monthly injections of expensive, experimental suppresants - she's unwittingly serving as a guinea pig for this substance, currently being worked on by Telcom.

Mara Circo

The gangs and druglords have never left the Isthmus. If they don't directly affect the corporations, they're left to their own devices. Mara Circo has existed since before the Second Civil Wars, originally getting clown tattoos to prove their allegiance. This practice has grown into hybridization by 2095.
With members spread across the Isthmus, the gang is headquartered at the center of The Lung National Protected Park, at the northernmost section of the area, where they deal in cheap poppy with the corporations. When hybridization got popular, their leader decided they would all become jaguar hybrids, and getting their boutique jaguar gene splice that turns their coat into spots with a smirk and round nose in the middle became mandatory to remain in or join the gang. A better informed eye will notice those are ocelot genes, however.
Mara Circo's Moon Valley chapter has two forced encounters during the module. First, in Session 5: Jaguar Spotting, they steal Neuro-Dyne to minimize the pain of their unregulated boutique gene splicing process. Later, they extort one of Vargas' private team members, obtaining the Yellow Box. Once incorrectly powered, they cause the augmented reality underlining Session 7: 2095. The GM is free to add other gang encounters in the sections between corporate sprawls if so desired.

Appendix 2:

Homebrew Hindrances

Cyber Psychosis (Major)

Any time a character whose Strain Used exceeds their Strain Limit rolls a Critical Failure on any Trait roll, they immediately enter a state of Cybernetic Berserk Fury.

Effects of the Fury:

- Stat Boosts: The character gains +2 Toughness and ignores up to 2 points of Wound penalties.
- Targeting & Restraint: The character loses all tactical restraint and threat perception. They must immediately attack the nearest biological or mechanical target within movement or weapon range, regardless of allegiance.
- Neural Degradation: At the end of 2 consecutive rounds in Fury, the character gains a level of Fatigue. 2 rounds later, they become Exhausted. 2 more rounds, and they become Incapacitated (unconscious from total system burnout).
- Snapping Out: At the start of their turn, the character may make a Smarts -2 roll as a free action. Success immediately ends the Fury state (retaining any Fatigue incurred).
- Addiction & Suppression:
    - Once a character's Cybernetic Berserk Fury is triggered for the first time, their neural pathways are permanently destabilized.
    - Without active suppressants in their system, a cyberpsycho character must pass a Smarts -2 roll every 1 hour (or immediately following a high-stress trauma event) to avoid re-entering Cybernetic Berserk Fury.
    - Injecting neuro-blocking chemtech pauses this 1-hour clock for the duration of the dose. Once the dose wears off, the 1-hour countdown resumes.
- Removal:
    - The Cyberpsychosis Hindrance cannot be removed through Advancements. The only way to cure it is to have a qualified medical professional/biohacker surgically remove installed cyberware/bioware until the character's Strain Used falls back within their Strain Limit. Removing 'ware carries the same surgical Vigor roll risks and penalties as installing it.

Appendix 3:

Character Sheets

A note on creating new Player Characters: Any newly created player characters follow the normal Interface Zero 3.0 and Savage Worlds Adventure Edition character creation rules, with a few small additions:

- as the player characters are employed by Telcom, they have an Obligation (Major) hindrance by default.
- To balance this, they get a free Novice edge while being created, bound by the edge's requirements.
- This edge should narratively reflect the reason why the character was hired by Telcom.

As this module's setting requires quest giving via corporate gigs, if any player character is fired:

- The player character becomes an NPC for the GM to use as he sees fit.
- The player will have to create a newly hired player character, just as if the character had died.
- If the GM allows it, the player may attempt to have his fired character rehired before creating a new one, as long as this does not affect the flow of the current or next session.

The upcoming 18 Character Sheets define 5 Seasoned Premade Player Characters. For lore purposes, they should start the module in positions for which they are severely overqualified. I'm including lore basics experienced in my own table, but players should be encouraged to define background lore to their premades, fitting their characteristics:

- Dario Fierro
    - A Gearhead specializing in Hacking and Repair. For my session, he was working a dead-end job fixing devices brought to the Claims and Guarantees section of Telcom, his overachieving being noticed by Vargas.
- Bruno Barreto
    - A Bodyguard with the Brawny edge specializing in martial arts. For my session, he was a college athlete who got expelled for using illegal augmentations a couple of years prior to the first session. He now works as a towering security guard in the Telcom Valley of the Moon offices.
- Stefano Silva
    - A Scientist specializing in two-hand Shooting with a Trademark Weapon of his own invention and a control baseline weapon for comparison. For my session, he was an engineer for the weapons division of Telcom.

- Braulio Jaén
    - A Biohacker specializing in Healing. For my session, he was a frustrated research physician with a few papers published but nowhere as amazing as Oshima, now academically stuck and working as the in-house medic at the Telcom Valley of the Moon offices.
- Finnley Castillo
    - An Agent specializing in Spirit-related traits such as Persuasion and Intimidation. For my session, he was wealthy, highly connected yet underperforming, stuck at a manager level, in effect a lesser version of Giorgio or a better version of Vargas.

9 Named NPC Wildcards, who have been described in the previous Appendix:

- David Vargas
- Karol Oshima
- Vittoria Esposito
- Giorgio Botran
- Julieta de Botran
- Soraya Sambalá
- Raine del Sol
- Lili from La Mariposa
- Joaquin Gomez

and 6 generic enemy sheets to use in described encounters, or other encounters the GM and how the module evolves may invoke. Edges, hindrances, augmentations, weapons and armor may be added, removed or modified as required:

- Oshima lab Biodogs
- Mara Circo Big Cat Hybrid gangers
- Augmented Human 1.0 Neo Bolshevik Guerrillas
- Generic Unaugmented Human 1.0 enemies
- Generic Human 2.0 enemies
- Generic Android enemies

Thank you for reading. Enjoy your sessions,
- Guille
